Painesville TELEGRAPH, 19 July 1883, p. 3, col. 5:

Obituaries.

Died at his residence Thursday, July 12th, Albert Morley, in the 86th year of his age.

Perhaps no town in this country can boast of a stronger and more sterling class of men than that which included the early settlers of Painesville; men of marked individuality and strong mental force, and as they disappear from our midst one by one, we cannot banish from our mind the thought that soon we shall be called upon to lay the last one in his final resting place. Albert Morley was pre-eminently one of this class. He was born in Brutus, Cayuga county, New York, October 21st, 1797. He was married to Esther Healy, of Charlestown, New Hampshire, in 1818, sixty-five years ago. In 1837 he came with his wife to Painesville, where he has since lived, occupying for the period of forty-five years the old homestead in which he died. Of ten children born to them five still remain, and the grand-children now number thirty-nine. Children and grand children forty-five in all.

Mr. Morley's relation to this large family reminded one strongly of the old patriarchal form of government, for from the old home an influence always emanated strong enough to keep the interests and aims of this large family, scattered in different States, closely united, and caused the old head of the house to be consulted and deferred to in all business matters until the day of his death.

Such rugged and sterling qualities brought him as might be expected success in life both in its literal and widest sense, and the many loving hearts of which he and his wife were the centre, attest that he used his success wisely. As he was practical in business concerns so he was also in his religion. Religion to him was living, not believing. His life and death could be summed up as a literal and truthful response to the following precept:

"So live, that when they summons comes to join
The innumerable caravan, which moves
To that mysterious realm, where each shall take
His chamber in the silent halls of death,
Thou go not, like the quarry slave at night,
Scourged to his dungeon, but sustained and soothed
By an unfaltering trust, approach they grave,
Like one who wraps the drapery of his couch
About him, and lies down to pleasant dreams."

The Death of Esther Healy Morley.

The experiences that come within the period allotted to human life are in general so constant and unvarying in their nature that regarding them, sages, poets and painters, past and present, whatever their races or tongue or their mode of expressing it, substantially tell the same story. First comes passionate, impulsive youth, inspired by unattainable desires and encouraged by illusory hopes, regardful only of the future. Next comes middle age--the enchantments of youth rapidly disappearing, but too busily engaged in battling the stern realities of life to be mindful of much else than the present. Then comes old age--disenchanted at last, it humbly accepts defeat, and sitting down to rest during the few brief moments allowed it, sadly looks back upon the crushing sorrows and the blighted hopes that like wrecks lie strewn along the traveled path.

So truly typical of human life is this as a whole, that any departure from this established course by individual life immediately arrests our attention and makes us curious to know the cause. To the many acquaintances of Mrs. Morley whom a residence of fifty-two years among them had endeared to her, it is unnecessary to say that though not escaping some of the physical infirmities naturally belonging to old age, yet that her life as a whole was an exceptional one. Ninety-one years of an active, eventful life, with its due proportion of afflictions and sorrows, found her with a mind still undimmed, faculties alert, and with an undiminished interest in her relatives, neighbors, the people at large and with all of the vital questions of the present generation. Even when she had reached that extreme point in the voyage of life where the green and sunny banks of youth had given place to the bleak and desolate cliffs of advanced old age, and the beating of the surf of that dark and illimitable ocean was borne to her ears, the dying glow of youthful enthusiasm lingered over her face until she vanished in its enfolding darkness.

To say that this came solely from her religious trust, which was strong indeed, would hardly be true, for it would be presumptuous to say that it was stronger than that of her fellow Christians, but let us rather attribute these exceptional features to that best gift of Heaven, the power of coming into close sympathetic relations with every human creature, a power that ignored or vaulted over all barriers of color, creed or nationality; a sympathy that supported by a strong, practical, sanguine nature, gave courage to the timid, hope to the despondent and strength to the weak.

In her latter years she harvested what she had sown. This undiminished sympathy, this entering into the lives of others, brought from those of middle and advanced age the companionship that she valued so highly, and from the young there were reflected back to her the sweetness and enthusiasm of youth that made, so to speak, her life's spring perennial.

Esther Healy Morley was born in Charlestown, New Hampshire, Feb. 14, 1798. She was married to Albert Morley Jan. 29, 1818, and died April 22, 1889. She came with her husband from Brockport, New York, to Painesville in the summer of 1837, where she lived until the time of her death, occupying the present homestead for fifty years of this period. She was the mother of ten children, eight sons and two daughters. Five sons survive her death--J. H. Morley and C. H. Morley of Cleveland, J. R. Morley of Painesville, and G. W. and E. W. Morley of East Saginaw, Michigan, all of whom were present at the funeral ceremonies, and together with the oldest grandson, Thomas H. Marshall, of Chicago, bore the remains of the loved mother and grandmother to their last resting place in Evergreen Cemetery.
